The steamer arrived close to Kulan before midnight, the Eaglet anchoring a couple of cable lengths in shere of the man-of war. At five next morning the launches were set alongside the Rattler for the marines, and then, with the Powhattan's cutter, and three boats of the Rattler besides the captain's gig, made fast astern of the Eaglet, which, everything being ready, steamed slowly up the bay. At Kulan only one junk was to be seen, and it was feared the birds had flown, but Captain Caldwell descried a lorcha at in that direction.

The lorcha got under way apparently with the intention of escaping, when Capt. Fellowes dispatched the Rattler's pinnace her, and these had unfortunately got be you't recall before the pirate fleet, with narrow and shallow passage from which the loreha had started. As the steamer approached, the junks hoisted their sails. but without getting under weigh, until Congreve rockets discharged from the Ea-glet's quarter-deck by Mr. Pine, the gunner, and two marine artillerymen from the Ratiler, and two or three well-directed shots from a 32-pounder, fired by Mr. Ran-dall, her chief officer, started them from their fancied security; for up to that time the pirates had either not observed the bonts, or thought they would not have the temerity to attack them. In this, however, they soon discovered their mistake, for the boats, which had at first made for a narrow neck of land, bore up for and round the point, and then from the deck of the steamer was witnessed as bold an attack as was ever made in these waters.

The pirate fleet formed a dense mass, the larger and heavier armed junks bringing up the rear, every now and then yawing round and firing their broadsides at the boats, from which, in reply, tiny puffs of smoke arose as the howitzens in their bows discharged their more deadly contents, the sharpoell bursting over the junks and making frightful havoe among their crews. The hoats soon neared the pirates, Lieutenants Pegram and Rolando, with the launches of the Powhattan, first, with volleys of musketry clearing the decks of the two largest, then boarding and driving the pirates overboard at the point of the bayonet. This, however, was not done without a hard struggle, for the misorcants fought with the fury of despair; but they had of course no chance with the marines and

The can party. chief himself—Lee Afye, a principal leader of the Whampoa "patriots"—was shot by an English marine, who had jumped on deck from the Powhattan, slaunch, and four women threw themselves overboard, and were drowned. The ammunition on board the pirate fleet may be judged of from the fact that this junk alone is believed to have nearly one hundred kegs of English gunpowder, besides atinkpots, cartridges, and loose powder. Up to this time, only one serious casuality had happened to the attacking force, a young American marine, named Adamson, having been shot with a musket ball in the groin; lant two other fatal accidents followed in quick superssion. The Rattler's first cutter, in charge of Paymaster Brownsdon, ran slong side of a large junk.
